BRADYS

MONG the families that crossed the Alleghanies for settlement in Western Pennsylvania a few years before the break of the famous Pontiac war was one of the name of Brady. Ted Brady from the first was a fearless young rover of the woods, and gun in hand he was often to be seen in the forest, either in search of game or setting traps for the smaller animals that abounded in the locality. During one of these excursions into the woods the boy had the fortune to capture a very small bear cub, which he carried home without trouble. He raised the cub by hand, and had a good deal of fun with him as he grew the household, and often would follow Ted into the forest.

At the approach of night, no matter where Jack was, he would turn his face toward the cabin, and in one corner of it was sure to find a sleeping place till morning. With the uprising of the Indians, led by Pontiac, the Ottawa chief, one of the bravest and most relentless Indians of his day, the whole frontier passed from the sunshine of peace to the shadow of war. The Bradys heard of the coming storm some time before it reached them. It was reported that the Indian spies were abroad in the land, spying out the weaknesses of the settlements preparatory to a swoop upon them, and one day several were seen in the vicinity of the Brady cabin. Ted had been trapping along a little stream near home for some time. The boy, who was stout and 'quick for his 16 years, though not very large, had become an expert in trapping the fur bearing animals of the forest and stream, and his stock of furs were known to be the best and most valuable of any in the neighborhood.

Michael Brady, the father, thought that the whole frontier should be made acquainted with the true situation regarding the Indian uprising, and as he had picked up a good deal of reliable information he deemed it his duty to spread the news. Therefore he set out on his mission one day, intending to be gone nearly a week. "Watch the house well," said the Celt. "Know everything that approaches it, and on no occasion open the door to anybody but Jack." One evening the boy went out to his traps. He had that morning car-and he caught sight of his mother. ried them to a new trapping ground and he thought best to take another look before leaving them for the

The night promised to have the light of the full moon. The sky was perfectly clear and the crisp leaves that littered the ground gave forth musical sounds as they crackled underneath the boy's feet. That very day Ted had taken the rifle apart to give a thorough overhauling, and every part had been inspected and oiled. With the weapon slung over his shoulder the Irish boy tramped through the woods, found the traps all right, and, after seeing that the triggers were well set, turned and began his homeward trip. By this time the sun had gone down and the long shadows of dusk were falling between the trees. But over the hill on his right rose the full orbed moon, and more than once Ted stopped and watched its stately ascent. He had reached a little stream near the cabin and had set his feet on the foot log for the purpose of crossing it, when he caught sight of SERMED TO JUMP INTO THE AIR. something moving toward the cabin. He could see the house through an opening in the forest. The moonlight fell around it revealing it in the little clearing with uncommon distinctness.

"It is Jack going home," said Ted with a smile, when he had watched the moving object for a while. "He's been off on another excursion and is just getting in."

Then he thought of surprising the bear with one of his shrill whistles and placed his fingers to his mouth to sound it when he suddenly stopped. The bear had stopped, too. Not only this, but the next moment Ted Brady's heart took a leap into his throat, for the animal rose on its hind feet near a tree and remained standing a full minute as straight as an Indian. While Jack was capable of doing a great many tricks and could him get up with such grace of move-The bear appeared to be looking straight toward the house from the tree where he stood, and Ted, who jumped down from the log and sprang to a tree near by, looked on with a boy's keen curiosity. "Maybe it's another bear," rushed through Ted's mind. "And what if it isn't a bear at all?" He was not close enough to get a very good look at the animal, and in order to do so he crawled along the ground to another tree, from behind which he took another look.

By this time the bear had dropped to the ground again and all at once Ted saw that it had a cut ear, which was just what Jack had had for three years.

Once more Ted was in the act of whistling to his pet, when the animal started toward the house on all fours, running over the ground in a manner not exactly in accordance with the usual locomotion of bears, but not very unlike either. "I never saw Jack run that way before," cried the boy as he bounded on. "He is heading for home and will beat me there if I don't make better time. Maybe Jack has been wounded, the boys down on the creek shot at him twice last summer, and-" Ted stopped, for once more the older. At last he became the pet of bear had checked his course and was moving across the clearing toward the little cabin in one of whose little windows Mrs. Brady had set a light. Ted watched the bear moving over the stumpy clearing with his head pointing toward the shanty, but all at once he saw more than this. That which he saw was enough to thrill him as he had never been thrilled before. It was nothing less than a moccasin, where one of the hind feet of the supposed bear should have been, and the more he looked the surer he was of this. The skin before him was Jack's, but an Indian was inside it, and, of course, for some diabolical purpose. Well did the red man know that he could never get beyond the door of the Brady cabin in his own dress; therefore, probably knowing something about the boy settler's pet, he had killed Jack in the forest and had undertaken this stratagem to carry out his evil designs.

Ted knew that if his mother should see the supposed Jack in the clearing, she would hasten to open the door to him, without suspecting anything wrong, and when he thought of the peril that menaced her he could hardly suppress a cry.

The Irish boy had reached the fringe of the clearing, and, in the brilliant moonlight, he saw the object that moved across it. Not a moment was to be lost; yet a shot must tell, for if thrown away, the young marksman would have upon him one of the dread scourges of the frontier, and he might be the first victim of savage fury in that locality.

his shoulder, the cabin door opened, She had opened the door for "Jack," and the redskin had only to spring up and with a bound carry himself beyoud the threshold. Controlling his nerves with the coolness of an old marksman, Ted covered the shaggy head and fired.

E At the sharp report a dark object seemed to spring into the air, and the next instant it lay on the ground, while the white-faced woman in the doorway gazed across the clearing, too frightened for a moment to stir. Ted ran forward, so as to be seen in an instant, and as he cleared the ground between the scene of his shot and the cabin he was recognized and his mother cried out: "It is Jack you have killed, boy! Didn't you recognize the old fellow?" Ted met his mother at the door, and for a moment, looking up into her face, he could not answer her; but

"Jack never wore moccasins, mother. The bear out there happens to be an Indian." After awhile mother and son dragged the body to a secluded spot behind the cabin. There a grave was made, and in it they placed the corpse of one Indian who would never return to follow Pontiac across the frontiers.

If the Indian had companions in the neighborhood, they retreated without seeking to revenge the death of their spy, and when the tide of war flowed into that region, the Bradys had taken refuge in one of the more eastern forts, where they remained till the uprising had been put down. The German emperor frequently has a week's retirement from the bustling world, and hides within the depths of the forest of Prockelwitz, where a small cottage is his abode, nestled beneath a splendid oak, with forest round him for miles. There, while the dew is on the trees, he starts forth gun in hand, with a brace of dogs and a sturdy forester, and at 4 o'clock he is at the best spot for sport. Then his majesty uses his gun till 11, when he wends his way homeward to his cot, eats and sleeps awhile, after which he puts his signature to all the documents which require it and have been duly forwarded from Berlin to his lonely sylvan retreat.
